

JOHN DONNELLY

John Donnelly is a writer based in Washington, D.C., specializing in global health and environmental subjects. He is currently a Kaiser Family Foundation media fellow, writing a book on Americans working to help African orphans, and is vice president and senior editor at Burness Communications in Bethesda, Md. From 1999 to early 2008, he was a reporter with The Boston Globe. He worked for five years in the Washington bureau of The Globe, covering foreign policy, with a special focus on global health issues. From 2003 to mid-2006, he opened and ran the Globe's first-ever Africa bureau. Based in South Africa, he traveled widely around the continent, focusing on a wide range of health issues, politics, counter-terrorism, development policy, and the future of oil in Africa.

Prior to joining the Globe, he worked for a year in Washington for Knight Ridder Newspapers and spent four years based in Jerusalem and Cairo covering the Middle East for Knight Ridder and the Miami Herald. He has also worked for the Associated Press in New York City and in Vermont, and was a staff reporter for the Burlington (Vt.) Free Press. He has won many awards for his work, including being part of the Pulitzer Prize-winning coverage of Hurricane Andrew for the Miami Herald; and individual awards from the Global Health Council, RESULTS, InterAction, and the American Society of Tropical Medicine and Hygiene.

He attended the University of Maine and University of Vermont, majoring in English. He was a Duke University Media Fellow in 2000. He is married to Laura Hambleton, and they live with their three children in Chevy Chase, Maryland