ROBERTO SURO

Director

Pew Hispanic Center

Roberto Suro is executive director of the Pew Hispanic Center, a recently launched initiative of The Pew Charitable Trusts and the University of Southern California Annenberg School for Communication.

Through public opinion surveys and demographic research, the project is an important source of non-partisan information on the rapid growth of the Latino population and its implications for the nation as a whole.

Suro has nearly 30 years of experience writing on Hispanic issues and immigration, most recently for The Washington Post. Suro's book, Strangers Among Us: Latino Lives in a Changing America, is widely considered an authoritative and probing account of Hispanic immigration to the United States.

During his career in journalism, Suro also worked for TIME Magazine and The New York Times. He has covered the Justice Department, the State Department and other Washington beats. Suro has been posted as a foreign correspondent in Latin America, Europe and the Middle East and has done long tours as a domestic correspondent in Chicago and Houston.
