

Health care as an agenda item

2008 has been a roller coaster year in countless ways, and not least for those interested in health care's role in the presidential election. While the year started with health care tied a close second with the economy for top voting issue (and only 9 percentage points behind the then-top issue – Iraq) the rising tsunami of economic problems swamped health care and every other issue to dominate the agenda in the weeks before the November vote. Health care remains roughly tied for second, but this ranking is somewhat misleading: it is 50 percentage points lower than the economy, as is the other former top tier issue – Iraq.

Thinking ahead to the November 2008 presidential election, what is the single most important issue in your vote for president? Is there another issue that's nearly as important? (open-ended, top 3 responses shown among registered voters)

Which comes close to describing your own views? (among registered voters in October 2008)

Given the economic challenges facing the country...

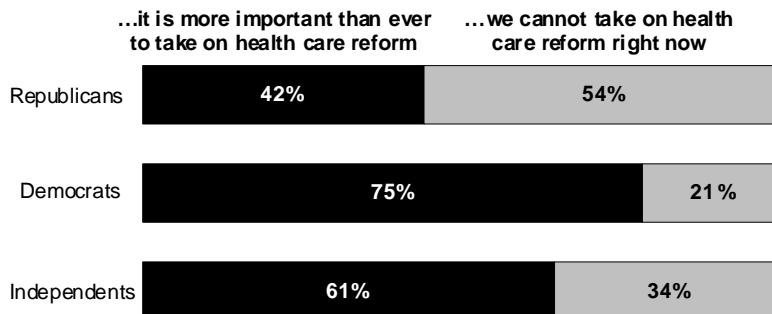

Despite economy, health care reform not off the table

That said, Kaiser's final election tracking poll shows that health care reform is far from off the table. Overall, nearly twice as many voters agree that in the face of a struggling economy "it is more important than ever to take on health care reform" than agree the country cannot tackle this issue given the current situation. This resonates with our continued finding that health care concerns are a major strand of voters' economic anxiety.

The majority agreement among registered voters on health care reform masks an important ideological divide: large majorities of Democrats (75 percent) and political independents (61 percent) say that now more than ever we need to tackle health care issues. But a majority of Republicans (54 percent) say that "given the economic challenges facing the country, we cannot take on health care reform right now."

When it comes to health care, it's affordability that tops the list

Which ONE of the following health care issues is most important in your vote for president? (among registered voters in October 2008)

Affordability is now the issue named by the largest number of Republicans (51 percent), Democrats (50 percent) and political independents (46 percent). Among Democrats, expanding coverage for the uninsured ranks second, named by 35 percent of those voters. Coverage also ranks second for political independents, named by a somewhat smaller proportion (23 percent). Relatively few Republicans (9 percent) name coverage as a health care priority.

These findings are reflected in the type of coverage reform voters are seeking. A large majority of Democrats (74 percent) say they would like to see a major effort to provide health insurance for all or nearly all the uninsured, even if this entails spending. On the other hand, a plurality of Republicans (36 percent) say they would prefer not to tackle coverage issues at all, with 29 percent supporting a minor expansion. Independents lean toward a major plan (47 percent), though fewer support the effort than among Democrats.

Overall, support for a major effort on coverage has hovered around 50 percent for the duration of the campaign, with roughly one in four supporting a minor effort and one in seven supporting the status quo. This stability does mask some internal movement among partisans on the coverage issue, however. Perhaps in reaction to the fall's economic news, Democrats are now at their highest support in the tracking poll for a big plan, while Republicans have moved in the other direction and are at their highest level of support for maintaining the status quo.

Which ONE of the following three things would you like to see in a health care reform proposal from a presidential candidate? (among registered voters)

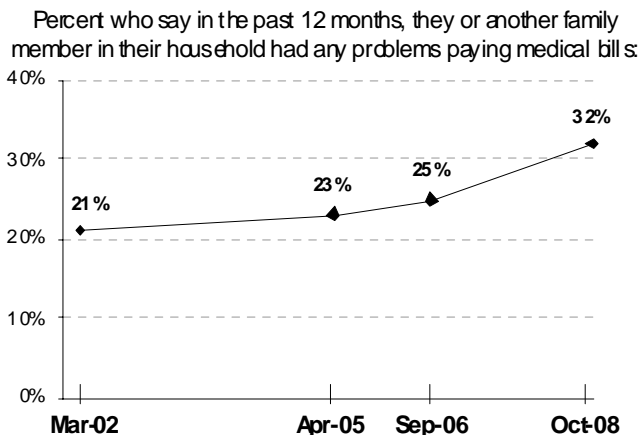

These partisan differences in support for coverage expansion may be in part explained by the fact that most Democrats (69 percent) and half of independents (51 percent) think that universal coverage would help the overall economic situation in the United States, while only 34 percent of Republicans agree.

Health care costs and the economic downturn: Personal impact

One in three Americans report their family has had problems paying medical bills in the past year, up from about a quarter saying the same two years ago. Those with low incomes are even more likely to report such problems – nearly half (46 percent) of those making under $30,000 a year say they have experienced such a problem in the past 12 months.

And these bills are not negligible. Among those who report having trouble with medical expenses over the past year, most say the bills in question are in the thousands of dollars, rather than the hundreds. Overall then, nearly two in ten Americans report problems paying medical bills totaling upwards of $1,000 in the past twelve months. Given these amounts, it is not surprising that among the group reporting problems paying medical bills, a majority say these expenses have had a “major impact” on their families.

In the past 12 months, did you or another family member in your household have any problems paying medical bills, or not? (October 2008)

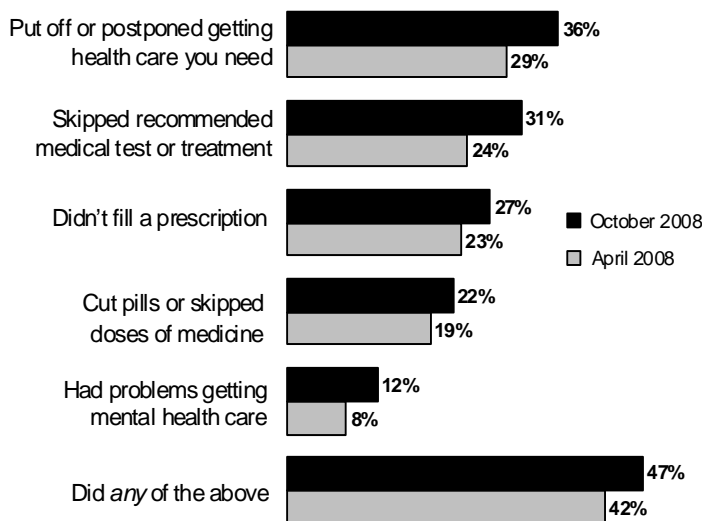

Would you say the amount of these medical bills was...* (based on total; October 2008)

*Don't know/Refused not shown

Percent of total who say they or a family member have done each of the following in the past year because of cost...

Not only are more Americans reporting problems meeting their medical expenses, many also report changing their actual consumption of health care services to help curb their costs. Nearly half (47 percent) of Americans report someone in their household taking one of five actions involving skipping necessary health care in the past year because of the cost. Specifically, just over one-third say they put off or postponed needed care and three in ten say they skipped a recommended test or treatment, both up seven percentage points since April. Roughly one in four say they did not fill a prescription, and only slightly fewer say they cut pills or skipped doses. One in ten say they have had problems getting mental health care because of the cost.

Americans with lower incomes are significantly more likely than those making more money to put off care. Fully half (51 percent) of low-income families say they put off or postponed getting the health care they needed in the past year, compared to three in ten (31 percent) families earning more than $30,000 per year.

The October survey also finds an increase in the proportion of Americans making job-related decisions based mainly on health insurance considerations. One in four Americans (25 percent) report that they or someone in their family has stayed in a job over the past year because of health care benefits, up from 18 percent in April 2008. Roughly one in ten (13 percent) report switching jobs in the past year mainly because the new job offered better health care benefits. The share who say either has occurred – that in the past year, they or someone in their household had decided to take a new job or stay at a job mainly because of better health benefits – has grown from nearly one-quarter (23 percent) in April to three in ten (30 percent) now.

Economic hardship spreading; Health care costs an exacerbating factor

Health care is, of course, one of multiple vital goods and services which have become more expensive over the past year, meaning Americans are being faced with financial challenges on multiple important fronts at once. The current survey finds that seven in ten Americans now say they are experiencing a serious problem with at least one of a list of seven pertinent economic challenges as a result of recent changes in the economy, up 12 percentage points in two months. Overall, about three in ten report serious problems paying for health care or health insurance, roughly parallel to the findings above.

The biggest change in these measures over the past two months, not surprisingly, is the percent who report a serious problem with losses in the stock market, which doubled to 31 percent. The most widely experienced problem continues to be paying for gasoline, which four in ten say is a serious challenge for their family.

Asked what would make the most difference in their day to day financial lives, large majorities say that a decrease in the price of gas (73 percent) and food (64 percent) would help “a lot.” Getting a raise is the third most widely mentioned factor (57 percent).

Importantly, half (51 percent) say lower prices for health care and insurance would make a big difference in their family’s financial situation, a larger percentage than say they would see a major impact from a rebound in the stock market (45 percent). This emphasizes a point we have consistently seen reflected in the tracking poll: health care concerns are an inextricable part of the economic concerns that voters are expressing this fall. A reduction in health care prices would make even more of a difference for those in lower income households: in this group, two in three (67 percent) say this would make a big difference in their financial situations.

As a result of recent changes in the economy, have you and your family experienced any of the following problems, or not? Was this a serious problem, or not?

Majority say Senator Obama more likely to address health care as president

Consistent with his recent rise in the national horse race polls, Senator Obama has widened his advantage as the candidate who best represents voters' views on health care issues in recent months. For the first time, a majority of voters (54 percent) name Senator Obama, twice as many as name Senator McCain (25 percent). Independent voters are twice as likely to say Senator Obama represents their views on health care as to say Senator McCain does. Senator Obama has also strengthened his dominance in being perceived as the candidate who would be more likely to prioritize health care in his administration, with two-thirds (67 percent) of voters choosing him and two in ten (19 percent) choosing Senator McCain.

Voters were also asked which candidate would be more likely to take a variety of specific aspects of health care reform. Majorities of voters say Senator Obama would do more to make sure uninsured Americans get health coverage (72 percent) and to make health care and insurance more affordable (61 percent). In addition, a plurality say he would do more to lower the federal budget deficit (45 percent). Voters are more split between who would do more to lower the nation's overall health expenditures, with about four in ten saying Senator Obama (37 percent) and Senator McCain (41 percent) would do more.

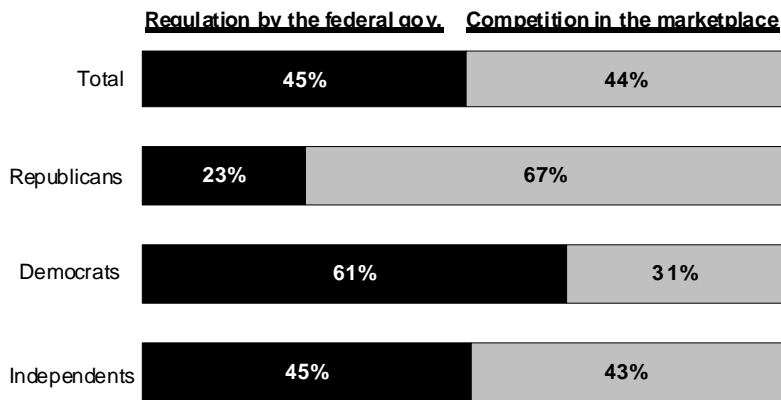

Voters say candidates have paid too little attention to health care, energy

Just over half of voters say that the presidential candidates – at the end of two years of town hall meetings, speeches and debates – have paid too little attention to health care (54 percent) and energy issues (55 percent), with Democrats and independents more dissatisfied than Republicans on these issues. Pluralities also say there has not been enough attention on economic issues (50 percent) and terrorism (47 percent), with independents particularly in agreement on the former and Republicans on the latter. Voters were more divided on whether they had heard too little (36 percent), too much (18 percent), or the right amount (43 percent) on the topic of the war in Iraq.

No agreement on how to hold down costs

There is a surprising amount of bipartisan agreement that lowering the cost of health care would help improve the overall U.S. economy. But there is little bipartisan agreement as to the best way to achieve those cost cuts. Overall, roughly half of voters say that regulation by the federal government would do a better job restraining costs, while the other half believe that competition in the marketplace is a more effective strategy. Not surprisingly, Democratic voters tilt toward the former explanation, while Republicans tilt toward the latter. Independents split down the middle.

Which of the following do you think would do a better job at keeping health care costs down? (among registered voters in October 2008)

*Don't know/Refused not shown

In the midst of serious national disagreements over the role of regulation in the nation's financial meltdown, voters also disagree about the amount of regulation in the area of health care policy. The one area where a bipartisan majority agrees there is not enough regulation: health insurance company treatment of those with pre-existing conditions (72 percent of Democrats say so, 67 percent of independents and 51 percent of Republicans). Most Democrats and independents also think there is not enough regulation when it comes to the cost of health insurance (59 percent and 56 percent, respectively) and prescription drugs (54 percent and 53 percent). At the same time, a plurality of voters (46 percent) are content with the amount of regulation of doctor and hospital quality, and voters have mixed views about current regulation of drug safety (43 percent say "right amount," 43 percent "not enough," and 8 percent "too much").

Methodology

This Kaiser Health Tracking Poll: Election 2008, the eleventh and final in a series, was designed and analyzed by public opinion researchers at the Kaiser Family Foundation led by Mollyann Brodie, Ph.D., and including Claudia Deane and Carolina Gutiérrez. A nationally representative random sample of 1,217 adults ages 18 and older, including 1,115 adults who say they are registered to vote, was interviewed by telephone between October 8 and 13, 2008. The margin of sampling error for the full sample is plus or minus 3 percentage points and plus or minus 4 percentage points for the sample of registered voters. For results based on subgroups, the sampling error is somewhat higher.

For full question wording and results, see the Toplines at http://www.kff.org/kaiserpolls/h08_posr102108pkg.cfm.
