

MATCHING TREATMENT TO SEVERITY OF PROSTATE CANCER by Roberto Daza

This was not the most involved story I've written, but it is a good example of writing on deadline. I had two hours to write and report this story before The Seattle Times' print deadline, and before the wire services crafted a version of their own. It required me running through a self-imposed crash course on prostate cancer, and then quickly finding an independent source to verify my information -- all this while making sure my writing was concise and grammatically correct.

This story originally ran in The Seattle Times on August 17, 2011.
